HONGKONG, MARCH 16TH, 1895.

THE EXTENT to which the financial credit of China has suffered from her defeat by Japan may be gathered from the fact that of the recent six per cent. loan of three million sterling issued on the London market only a little over one-third was subscribed by the public, the remainder being left on the hands of the underwriters. It is said that the reason why the loan did not go is that "the public does not comprehend the position and strength of the security, while it is uneasy about its value under the repeated defeats of the Chinese." The readiness with which previous Chinese loans were taken up, however, would go to show that the character of the security, when unencumbered, was fully appreciated; that portion of the explanation put forward for the unpopularity of the recent loan therefore appears insufficient. The true explanation evidently is that the public recognise the alteration that has taken place in China's financial condition. The Customs revenue would be much more than sufficient security for the loan of three millions sterling and the recent silver loan, if the Chinese Government were in a position to carry out its intentions, for the annual service of the loan." But a conquered country with a heavy indemnity to pay cannot be considered so completely mistress of her own revenues as to give unimpeachable value to an undertaking as that above quoted. It is said that Japan will demand an indemnity of sixty millions sterling in addition to the expenses of the war, which may possibly be imposed at another ten million. The readiest means by which China could raise money to meet that charge would be by hypothecating her Customs revenue, but the whole of it would be insufficient to cover the annual interest on a loan of £70,000,000. The reluctance of that section of the investing public which affects Government bonds, and which values good security above high interest, to take up the new Chinese loan is therefore quite comprehensible, for there is a chance though we think a small one, that payment of the interest might have to be deferred. Japan, if she had an entirely free hand in the matter, might take over the administration of the Customs until her claims were fully satisfied, and might with some show of reason say that the obligations incurred by China for the purpose of waging her unsuccessful war must stand over. But in view of the foreign interests at the treaty ports it is not at all likely that Japan will seek to interfere with the administration of the Customs; what is more probable is that she will hold territorial security until her demands are satisfied and leave China to raise the money as best she can. In that case the foreign loan will still remain the first charge on the Customs, and the underwriters, though they have probably more of the paper left on their hands than they expected, may be compensated on having a very remunerative investment. It is evident, however, that China has come to the end of her borrowing power for the present, and that it would be impossible to float another loan during the continuance of the war. When peace is restored her financial necessities will be very considerable, and European capitals may then be found, once more ready to accommodate her, provided the political stability of the empire seems fairly assured. But her present Customs revenue will scarcely afford sufficient cover for all the borrowing she will have to do, and that revenue will itself be impaired by the exigencies involved by the looting off of Formosa. Under the pressure of necessity, therefore, China may be led to float her internal revenue system on an honest basis, similar to that of the Foreign Customs, in order to render it available as security for such accommodation as may be required.
